Typical sources of such agents include a syringe, a needle and/or an oral applicator. Although a syringe or needle is effective for some applications, it is less desirable for others where access to the site is more limited, e.g., the tissue surrounding a tooth. An oral applicator can be a scalpel or other tool having a cutting edge that directly introduces the agent into the tissue. However, these instruments can be more invasive and can result in greater tissue trauma or damage than a needle or a syringe. Moreover, the applicator can tear or puncture the surrounding tissue. Hence, it would be desirable to provide an apparatus that allows delivering treatment, diagnostic or therapeutic agents into a patient's tissue, without unduly traumatizing the tissue. It would also be desirable to provide an applicator that is simple and effective to use. Furthermore, there is a need for an applicator that is capable of delivering therapeutic, diagnostic, or cosmetic agents directly into the tissue of a patient. Such an apparatus is needed for treating, removing, or protecting a patient's tissue, e.g., the base of a tooth.The incidence and risk factors of preterm birth in pregnancies of women with live birth of three or more premature infants.
